Kelly Composes Poem On Punishment

=""No more are the creatures of the earth, no more are the beasts of the field, no more are the birds of the air, no more are the fishes of the sea."

"The rat" is not the only one who is punished. It is every living creature on earth. The poem ends with a reminder that we must all take responsibility for our actions and strive to live in harmony with nature.

Through all the strife that fills our lives, it is important to remember that we are all connected and that our actions have consequences. The poem serves as a reminder to be mindful of our impact on the world around us.

Campus Camera

The picture shows a group of people gathered outside, with the text "No more" visible. The context of the scene is unclear, but it appears to be related to the poem's message of responsibility.

Facing the grue of trying to please others, and the burden of judgment, the poem's author encourages us to live a life that is true to ourselves and to the principles that guide us.

The poem's message is one of hope and optimism, reminding us that even in the face of adversity and challenge, we can find peace and contentment by living in harmony with nature and with each other.

The poem's author invites us to consider the interconnectedness of all living things and to take responsibility for our actions. By doing so, we can find a sense of peace and fulfillment in the world around us.

---

The poem "No more" is a powerful reminder of our interconnectedness and the importance of living in harmony with nature and with each other. It challenges us to consider our actions and their consequences, and to strive for a life that is true to ourselves and to the principles that guide us.

The author invites us to reflect on the interconnectedness of all living things and to take responsibility for our actions. By doing so, we can find a sense of peace and fulfillment in the world around us.