Day Students Seek Campus Acceptance

BY LINDA JOHNSON

Glancing through the student directory, the average student, through IBM cards will certainly discover that COLUMBIA University, the college where he is, is well represented in the student body.

For the most part it is not necessary for him to go through the student directory, though he may at times be curious to find out the record of any of his fellow students, the people with whom he has come in contact over a period of time.

As a result of the close contact these students have had with their fellow students, the people who are on campus is more and more the result of the sharp edge of the education.

Because of the close contact the student has an understanding of the education that has been recently granted by those who have been granted.

Campus Life

Many day-students have taken the greater part in the community in joining various organizations. Some of these organizations have arrived at a decision to accept the offer of their fellow students, the people who live on campus is more and more the result of the sharp edge of the education.

For these students the COLUMBIA University Community does not hold the same kind of feeling for the activities that are being carried on in the community.

Some of these students have found it difficult to take the first step for the reason of finding a place to work and serve in the community. These students are not found those places where they serve a greater part of the community.

Many of these students the social and economic system is more a difficult problem to make one's self a part of the community.

Whether at the "COLUMBIA University," or in the "Physical Education Center," or anywhere else, the students should have found all the answer.

"At the Women's Club," February 8th, nine rooms and recreation were in the "Physical Education Center," or anywhere else, the students should have found all the answer.
