Cooper construction enters new phase

The next construction phase of the new Thomas Cooper Library will begin soon and involves the most massive undertaking ever made by the University, according to Harold Brunton, vice-president for business affairs.

Excavation had been substantially completed and next approximately an acre of concrete base will be laid. This four-foot thick foundation slab will be taped by a five-inch floor. The total process will require nearly 6,500 cubic yards of concrete requiring approximately 700 truck loads of concrete.

University officials have speculated that this be the largest construction undertaken in the Southeast region.

The new library will have seven floors, four of them underground. It will hold approximately 1,500,000 volumes and seat 3,000.

Brunton said it would have more locked enclosures for graduate students and faculty members than any other library in the country. Designed by Edward Stone, the library is the largest building project the University has had since the coliseum. It will combine music, education and McKissick libraries and certain reference works presently stored in the Coliseum.

Brunton said present plans call for one fraternity house in McBryde Quadrangle, but there were no plans to destroy others.
