An anti-bias campaign aiming to increase the number of graduate and undergraduate students is being planned by the University of Southern California.

The program, known as the "College for All Students," aims to address issues of diversity and inclusion on campus.

According to a recent report, only 22 percent of entering freshmen at USC were black or Hispanic.

However, the university has set a goal of increasing the percentage of black and Hispanic students to 30 percent by 2020.

The program will include workshops, seminars, and mentorship opportunities for students.

"We want to create a more inclusive and welcoming environment for all students," said(UInt) President Carol L. Tatem. "We are committed to ensuring that all students have the opportunity to succeed at USC."
