Distributing condoms to co-eds creates controversy across U.S.

By The College Press Service

The debate on whether condoms belong on campus has emerged again.

At the University of Dayton in Ohio, students Russell Logen and John Perry are demanding that the administration stop the Democratic Socialists of America (DSA), a campus group, from passing out condoms on campus.

Controversies over condom distribution have arisen recently at Florida Institute of Technology, where the administration stopped a plan by the student newspaper to distribute condoms under the editorial urging students to have a safe spring break.

Students editors at other schools, including the University of Arkansas and Georgia State University, pulled off successful condom distributions.

For the past two years, DSA members have marked Valentine's Day by passing out condoms inside cards that say, "Love safely," because of the ensuing controversy, DSA passed them out again March 28 to "save the waters," according to DSA member Jon Wentz.

University of Dayton President Raymond Fitz, while criticizing the action, did not forbid it.

Logen and Perry want administration to ban condoms from being passed out at the Roman Catholic campus because it goes against church teaching, which says using contraceptives is wrong.

As one time, the pair had even demanded taking their complaint to the National Conference on Catholic Bishops.

"They felt the university needed to make a clearer stand for students trying to follow Church teachings on the subject," said Father Bob Hoge, advisor of the campus Ministry Professionals Commission, of which both Logen and Perry are members.

During the first condom distribution in 1989, administration allowed a statement saying they didn't support the distribution. This year, DSA members weren't allowed to pass the condoms out in the student union.

"Nothing that challenges Catholic doctrine would wipe out more than just condom distributions," Worthington said.

"We have books in the library about Catholic trad- itions. We have professors and students who are atheists . . . A lot of things here smack Catholicism in the face," he said.

"We don't exist to change people's morality," Worthington said.

While condoms are causing big headaches for some others are making money off of them. Two stu- dents at Tulane University graduated, opened a custom condom company at more than 20 universities around the country. The package went on sale on the school's logo.

At the University of Pittsburgh, where the custom condom feature a package on the package, officials are trying to find out whether Pitt is entitled to a slice of the profit because the package on the package resemble the school's Pitt Panther logo.
